UNIVERSITY OF BREMEN - APPLICATION DEADLINE 15 JULY 2018

The master's degree in "English-Speaking Cultures: Language, Text, Media" is a programme for students with a background in English Studies, North American Studies, English Linguistics and Comparative Studies (with a focus on English Linguistics or Literatures and Cultures in English), or related subjects.

The curriculum allows students to define their own fields of specialisation, drawing freely on the areas of language, text, and media within a highly flexible, research-based, structured teaching programme. Students build their own focus by concentrating on one of the three profile areas covered by the programme: (1) British, North American, and Postcolonial Literatures; (2) Linguistics: Varieties, Medialities, and Applications (including language variation and innovation, contact linguistics, multimodal linguistics, trans-, multi- and intermediality studies, as well as language teaching and assessment); and (3) British, North American, and Postcolonial Cultural History (including the analysis of cultural artefacts and materials). In addition, students develop specific competences in advanced communication focusing on the use of English in the professional world, refining their investigation, presentation, and negotiation skills.

All courses are taught in English.

The programme is free of tuition; there is a semester fee of approx. 300 €, including free use of regional public transport for the whole semester.
